THE BIG TRIAL AT WILLIAMSON

Williamson, W. Va., Feb. 25.—C. E. Lively, on the witness stand in the bullet battle case here this afternoon, revealed that with gentle speech and suave gestures all the time he was dispensing hash and ham and home-made pies to citizens of Matewan he was studying the "inside" of what took place in the trigger orgy of May 19, that led to the trial of Police Chief Sid Hatfield and 18 others on charges of having murdered Detective Albert C. Felts.

The defendants were seen to smirk as Mr. Lively took the stand as a state witness. They were sure that he would say nothing that might damage their case.

For months they had been steady customers in his neat little place of business.

He had come to Matewan a perfect stranger, and it had behooved all to be discreet to strangers, but he seemed to be so sympathetic and understanding that gradually they had warmed up to him, and—

"Where are you living at this time, Mr. Lively?" asked Captain S. B. Avis, starting the examination.

"Matewan," replied the witness, a smooth-shaven, somewhat round-shouldered man in the thirties, with the eyes of a hawk and an aquiline nose.

"Those employers are you?"

"Heldwin-Felts Detective Agency." The bombshell had hit home. There were noises of all sorts in defendants' row denoting every shade of surprise, shock and outright anger.

"In what capacity are you employed by the Baldwin-Felts Detective Agency?" asked Mr. Avis.

"Secret service," was the answer, and the witness allowed his eyes to rove over the defendants' row, as if impelled by an irresistible desire to catch the effect of his mask-off play.

Thereupon he told his story, partly to questioning, partly in narrative form. He said he and his family went to Matewan in the middle of July, 1920, almost two months after the gun battle, and opened a restaurant.

He went there under the direction of Thomas Felts, head of the agency. He re-enforced his restaurant-keeper's disguise by keeping in good standing as a member of the United Mine Workers of America.

His mission was to worm himself into the confidence of the union men and thereby into that of the defendants in the battle trial.

He proceeded to tell the fruits of his investigation in the same fashion in which he had revealed his identity.

He quoted from numerous "confidential" talks which he said a half dozen defendants, including Chief Hatfield, had had with him over their "ham and." His main sensation was this:

"Sid told me he killed Mayor Testerman because he was getting lined up too well with these Baldwin-Felts men."

A sneer crept over the face of Hatfield. As he had done yesterday during the Thomas Felts' testimony, he leaned over the shoulder of one of the attorneys and whispered excitedly.

His wife, who was Mayor Testerman's widow when she married Sid less than two weeks after the gun battle, in which Testerman was killed, had absolute control of her features. Hers truly was a poker face.

At this juncture Captain Avis elicited the admission from the witness that he had done the same sort of secret work in Matewan before the gun battle.

Lively sprang the "second sensation" by quoting as follows from one of his alleged conferences with Hatfield on one of these previous occasions:

"I asked Sid once why he didn't marry. He said he couldn't because another man had the woman he liked. I said: 'You must be crazy about the little blonde.'"

"He said: 'She isn't a blonde, she is a brunette. I'll have her, though, if I have to break through hell to get her.'"

Later the witness quoted Sid Hatfield as having admitted the killing of Albert Felts.

"Well, we were talking about the killing just after Albert Felts was shot, Sid shot Testerman."

"He said that Testerman was getting too well lined up with these Baldwin-Felts men."

The witness added that Hatfield also told him he shot Albert Felts.

He then proceeded to incriminate other defendants in a similar way, notably Reese Chambers and Arthur Williams.
